It's understandable if you've never heard of Lemuria before. The idea of Lemuria was popular in the 1800's, when scientists attempted to understand why there were similar animals found both on Madagascar and India – lemurs in particular. But, these animals did not exist in mainland Africa or in the Middle East. The best explanation available at the time was that there must have been a land somewhere in the ocean between those two lands that had since sunk into the ocean – a land bridge that had since disappeared.
