Players will all separate their seven cards into a two card low hand as well as a five card high hand. The poker value of the high hand must, of course, be higher than that of the low hand. The dealer will then use a rule called "house way" which he divides his own hand and turn over his cards. Then the two high hands and the two low hands will be compared, and whichever one has the higher value, wins the dealings. If a tie is produced the winnings go to the banker. Bets can also be made by players against other players and the dealer which is unlike that of traditional poker. The banker can be changed throughout the game and a player may decline to be the banker at any point, and in this case the next available person will take on that role.
